Finding Infinite Possibilities Where Before There Were Few: Fung Ming Chip's Art

Britta Erickson

Introduction

Fung Ming Chip takes a unique and revolutionary approach to calligraphy and seal carving, the most hallowed of the traditional Chinese visual arts. Brashly he pulls them apart to examine their fundamentals. (To say he deconstructs them seems too disengaged to describe his process.) Focusing on those art forms' basic, essential characteristics, he produces extraordinary explorative works of art that illuminate their nature. The unceasing inventiveness of Fung Ming Chip's works cast a fresh light on ancient art forms, even as superficially they seem to stray afar.

Born in Guangdong Province in 1951, Fung Ming Chip grew up across the border in Hong Kong, where he completed his primary school education. He worked for a while before moving to New Jersey in the United States in 1977. In the 1980s he wrote and directed five plays in Taiwan, and in the early 1990s published a novel. Since 1986 he has divided his time between New York, Hong Kong, and Taipei, but now stays mostly in Hong Kong. It would seem he had a physically and intellectually restless existence before he found his true calling as a revolutionary calligrapher, working also in the related area of seal carving, and then expanding his oeuvre to present the forms he evolved from investigating Chinese characters as sculpture, and integrated into large murals.

Over the past several decades, Chinese calligraphers have sought to propel their art into the post-modern era. Ink painters in a parallel situation have focused on the ink, the paper, and the process in order to engineer a fresh look at a time-honored mode of artistic creation. Calligraphers have employed similar approaches, but prior to Fung Ming Chip such efforts of deconstruction did not pursue that strategy to its logical and extreme conclusion.

Seal Carving and Sculpture: Toward a Personal Universe

Each Chinese character is a small wonder of design, with from one to more than thirty strokes arranged within a uniformly sized square. (That is to say, each character in a text, whether composed of one or of thirty strokes, is the same size.) A character's composition has been refined over the course of millennia, some beginning as pictograms, and all developing from less regimented beginnings to their final forms as now recorded in the dictionary. Along the way, the general aesthetics of the written word has evolved, too, partly in response to the medium on which text appeared during a particular era. Very early writing such as oracle bone script, for example, was scratched into turtle plastrons and cattle scapulae, resulting in thin lines very different from those of the writing styles developed later to be cast into bronzes: the latter scripts' features are more rounded and robust in feel because in place of oracle bones script's friable base, the characters were carved into an eminently more workable material, clay, prior to being cast in bronze. Following on from the bronze scripts was a more simplified script that became favored for use in seals, and has been designated seal script.

Chinese characters possess tightly knit compositions, and seals bring together a small number of characters, often four, into a larger harmonious composition, itself often square. The text is most often a name or studio name, and seals frequently function as would a signature, projecting the authority of the named individual or office-bearer. For his personal use, Fung Ming Chip has carved seals with unusual shapes (a triangle), humorous content (a rabbit, a carrot), and with elements of the text encroaching on the border, or tipped slightly off-kilter. These unusual elements are not without precedent: historically, seal carvers have at times used such shapes as gourds or the seal rock's natural shape; animals appeared in some of China's earliest seals, and some twentieth century artists like Ding Yanyong (1902-1978) featured amusing animals in their seals; and occasionally a character's stroke would creep into the seal's border. Nevertheless, in Fung Ming Chip's seals the nontraditional elements come together with a particular idiosyncratic charm.

Fung has pushed all three of these nontraditional seal carving elements to extremes, and more in his painted carvings. The reference of the carvings to seals is made clear in the presentation of relief areas painted the red of seal ink against a white background, with a framing element also in relief. But they differ from seals, most obviously in their much larger size, but fundamentally in the way the subject is treated. Through his intense period of carving innumerable seals, Fung Ming Chip had come to appreciate the characters as signs; breaking them into their constituent elements and returning to their pictographic forms, he developed the imagery for his wooden sculptures. Clouds, eyes, suns, and moons come together with less obviously identifiable forms in a delightfully quirky personal cosmography.

While he no longer creates wooden sculptures, Fung Ming Chip continues to play with the pictographic personal vocabulary he developed with his sculptures. The forms find re-expression in large-scale murals, for example the Inner Universe mural at the Center for Contemporary Art, Santa Fe (2007), and another created while artist in residence at Jesus College, Cambridge University in 2004.

Calligraphy: A Special Matter of Time

Writing with brush on paper revolutionized the aesthetics of writing, because every nuance of the line became completely controllable. But in the twenty-first century much writing is done on the computer, and very little with brush and ink. Not only have the subtleties of the brush been lost, as they were to those twentieth-century people who abandoned brush for pen, but in addition word processing with the computer obfuscates another important element of writing Chinese, namely stroke order. As Chinese became standardized, the way in which a character's strokes are assembled, and the order in which the strokes are written also became standardized: this facilitates both being able to fit the many strokes into the prescribed square format, and remembering how to write a character, not to mention being able to find it in a dictionary. Thus, not only is each Chinese character a small wonder of design, but the manner in which they are assembled is codified for convenience.

Whether writing in loose cursive script or the more carefully regulated regular script, calligraphers naturally compose their works of art according to the flow of their text, and with each character of the text composed according to rules of stroke order. Thus it is possible to follow the exact path of the brush from beginning to end, even in cases where the artist's style renders the text illegible. This is a key characteristic of Chinese calligraphy, and is essentially a record of the flow of time from the start to the finish of the work of art. The calligraphic work of art progresses in a linear fashion with no possibility of changing what has gone before: as such, it is like life itself.

Fung Ming Chip has made special note of time as the crucial element in calligraphy. He has stated: "In calligraphy theory, for a very long time everyone has considered calligraphy to be an art of line, but I have discovered that the special characteristic of calligraphic art is: time."¹ He also reasons that while this can be said of any form of writing, the interaction between the time element and the materials employed by the Chinese calligrapher is what gives Chinese calligraphy its unique characteristics. He says: "The brush moistens the paper with ink; the process of moving [the brush] through three-dimensional space is recorded due to the paper's absorbency, making a line. When it was not understood that the line is only the carrier, and the process of movement is the main element, it was mistakenly believed that calligraphy is an art of the line."

One Hundred New Scripts

According to Fung Ming Chip, he has invented over one hundred new scripts. All of them explore the possibilities inherent in Chinese calligraphy, from different directions. A special subset exploits the role of time. First, there is the chronological order in which the brushstrokes are applied to the paper. This order becomes apparent when one stroke crosses another: if the paper is already wet from one brushstroke, it cannot fully absorb ink from a subsequent brushstroke. We see this in Numbers (Ink Ball), where the light-toned numbers are not obliterated by the dark circle, because they sank into the paper first. In Time Script, the heavy lines of the first vertical row of calligraphy bleed out to occupy paper in the path of the second row, making the first row appear to overlap the second, because the lines of the second are blocked by the left-hand edge of the first. Light Script and White Ball Script similarly rely for effect on the resistance of already marked paper to subsequent applications of ink. A second manifestation of time plays out in New and Old Ink Script: when old and new ink are mixed, the larger ink particles in the old ink will clump together as the ink dries, resulting in two-tone brushstrokes. Another use of time appears in the handscroll format, where the viewer sees only one section of the work of art at a time, as she gradually spools through it.

Another approach to inventing new scripts is to capture the essence of a common visual form, for example with Scatter Needle Script, Plum Blossom Script, Willow Script, Bamboo Script, and Music Script, the latter suggesting musical notations. A third approach involves the disruption of the conventions of formatting calligraphy, for example Borders Script, in which lines of text are pushed to the outer edges of the paper.

Fung Ming Chip often chooses to write out texts that are humorous or profound, or both, often his own poetry. The script is chosen to harmonize with the meaning. Life, Death: Double Different Script is composed of the character sheng (life) overwritten by a larger darker character si (death). As mentioned earlier, the calligraphic work of art progresses in a linear fashion with no possibility of changing what has gone before: as such, it is like life itself. But in the case of Life, Death: Double Different Script, although death does indeed follow life, life is not extinguished: it shines on through death.

The writer Oliver Wendell Holmes, Sr. described individual words as poetic gems, saying, "The poetry of words is quite as beautiful as the poetry of sentences. The author may arrange the gems effectively, but their shape and lustre have been given by the attrition of ages." Chinese characters are, in themselves, like perfectly formed jades. It is too easy to accept their perfection, happy to appreciate the surface and watch as the calligrapher strings them into works of art. But in Fung's hands, pulling and pushing as they do at the characters' possibilities, we come to a deeper understanding of the individual forms. Fung Ming Chip's is a rare accomplishment: he has added a new dimension to calligraphy, and carved out a bold new space for creative thought.

FUNG MING CHIP : PROFILE

A self-taught artist who has been active as a sculptor, photographer, playwright, poet, and seal carver as well as calligrapher, Fung Ming Chip has excavated new layers of conceptual and structural freedom within seal carving and calligraphy's organic terrain of word and form.

Born in 1951, in Guangdong, China, Fung moved to Hong Kong as a child. Upon completing primary school, he began to work. In 1977 he moved to New York and encountered the world of art.

Since ancient times, the seal's vermilion impression served as a signature of authenticity. Fung changed the medium from stone to wood, then enlarging the size, the seal itself rather than the impression it left, became an independent art form. To improve his seal carving, he practiced calligraphy.

"What is calligraphy?" Fung concluded that calligraphy is an art of time and space, and therefore is closer to music and dance than to Chinese literature. Using his original compositions, key words or Buddhist scripture as the text, the structure of the character became the choreography for the brush. He has gone on to create over 100 different calligraphy script styles.

Among his many international exhibitions, Fung had a major retrospective of his works at the Taipei Fine Arts Museum in 1999. He was artist in residence at Cambridge University, and has work included in major private collections and public institutions. In 2008 he created Les Poemes du Mandarin tableware pattern for Hermes. He currently resides in Hong Kong.
